"I have always loved ruffles and a bow," Rosenberg says. "It's very Rachel Zoe. However, lately, I've been dressing outside of my comfort zone."

Rosenberg exudes femininity in the majority of her ensembles, from button-down shirts to structured little black dresses, fur shrugs and billowy blouses. She is ladylike and classic with her clothing and accessory choices. Recently, Rosenberg began incorporating edgy pieces into her look, to mix it up a bit. From leather pants to skulls to layered necklaces, she is experimenting with fashion more than ever.

"I've been dressing a little more LA funky," she says. "I used to be very preppy, but when I turned 40, I decided to take more risks."

"I'm one hundred percent an accessories person," she adds. "I love huge rings, necklaces and men's watches. Go big or go home. Dainty shmainty."

Her passion for fashion has been apparent her entire life. "When I was in high school, I styled all of my friends," she says. "I was always reading Vogue and keeping up on the latest trends."

After college, she was the fashion publishing director at Child Magazine for seven years. She helped produce the first-ever children's fashion show under the tents at New York Fashion Week. She then moved on to Allure magazine and was their American fashion publishing director.

Rosenberg has tabled her career for the time being to raise her son, Andrew, but will definitely get back into the fashion industry when he gets a little older. In the meantime, she spends any free time being active in Bergen County, Andrew's school and her husband, Michael's, business, The Timepiece Collection in Englewood.

"Michael's business is fashion-related," she says, "I'm always on the charity scene with his store or for another event in the community."

"Fashion has always been a part of my life, and I put great thought into what I put on my body," she says. "I want to set a trend, not follow one." ■

TOM FORD PERFUME

"I wear one fragrance for a long period of time, and it becomes my signature scent. It is clean, fresh and not overpowering."
